October 2015

Cheryl Gurz: For me, next year priorities are going to be around blockchain and other technologies related to blockchain, so that we view how we're going to bring it into our back office, so that we can find ways to deliver new products, new ideas, new services to our community, bringing a merging of our legacy systems and maybe some replacement with some of these new technologies.

Alan Verschoyle-King: So, my key priorities for next year will be growth, of course. The capturing of disruptive technology and as opposed to having that be done to us, actually owning the disruptive technology process and building it into the business, and using that to the advantage of our clients. And, of course, continued effective risk management.

Scott Coey: I think we've got to continue this road in Europe down towards T2S and what that means between now and 2017 for the European landscape that's changing, but also see the overlay of innovation, and see where the change is going to take. The conversations around blockchain. The conversations about European landscape. Old meeting new is going to be very exciting next year.

Samir Pandiri: So, our key priorities are really focused around our client segments. So, our key segments are asset owners, asset managers, banks and broker-dealers, insurance companies, and alternative asset managers. What we really want to do is deliver end-to-end solutions for each of those segments in a very holistic way. So again, I think helping clients deal with, you know, access state-of-the-art technology, you know, getting the best processing systems, reduce costs, you know, much efficient, much more efficient processing. So, again I think all of those things that clients are looking for us to help them with, is really what we are focused on.

Arnon Goldstein: My key priorities for next year is finding areas of growth, at the same time, delivering excellent product to our clients. It's a tough environment, but we're very confident that we'll find the areas to service our clients, and also find growth at the same time.

Dominic Broom: Key priorities for next year are continued development of our transactional infrastructure built around technology platforms that deliver value to our clients. And what passes through a global institution like BNY Mellon is huge amounts of data on a daily, weekly or monthly basis. And if we can better aggregate and manage that data, and turn that data into profitable and usable chunks of information that can be used by our clients, then that makes them more readily able to transact their business, and for the whole wheels, for the wheels of global commerce to run more smoothly as a result.

Leda Glyptis: Hopefully, this time next year will be clients that will be coming to our booth saying, Where has Nexen gotten to? I want to hear all about it. I want to hear how the journey has taken off.

Mike Bellacosa: We're working on a few things for next year. One is on emergent technologies. Also, we're working on actually building out an Asian payments center hub for our payment services to offer our clients. Another big item is on real-time payments. In the United States, there's going to be a new real-time payments system, and we are very actively working on that program for 2016.
