

CURRENCY HEDGING – EXPLORING THE OPTIONS

Your funds are under increasing pressure. There's always fund performance and the competition, but more and more, investors are coming forward with stringent demands, tailored and focused requirements and much stronger opinions on risk management.

Currency volatility poses a very real risk for investment performance, and managing the associated currency risk is not always part of the strategy.

With these new demands and the increased focus on risk management, funds and their currency hedging strategies are coming under closer scrutiny.

A currency hedging program typically involves either portfolio (investment) hedging or share class (investor) hedging or a combination of both.

Portfolio hedging helps to protect investors from the foreign exchange impact of a fund investing in assets denominated in currencies other than the fund's base currency.

Share class hedging aims to protect non-base currency investors from the performance impact of valuing their fund holdings in a currency other than the fund's base currency.

Currency hedging can be complex, and it involves both operational and financial risk. Determining how a currency hedging program should be run and who should perform the administrative and operational functions are key decisions. Should you run a self-managed, in-house currency hedging program? Or should you use a currency administration service provider?

An in-house program might be considered a cost-free model, but you invest time, talent and technology in the program, resources that could be allocated elsewhere. An in-house program could also add higher transaction costs and performance divergence on the share class to the potential detriment of the underlying investors.

By using a currency administration service provider for currency hedging, vs. having an in-house program, you may achieve a higher level of automation and efficiency. You may also significantly reduce your operational costs and re-allocate resources so that they add more value for investors by allowing you to focus on core investment decisions.

Transparency into a fund's operations and execution standards is another potential benefit of using a service provider. This transparency can help you with administrative, due diligence and regulatory requirements by augmenting existing internal oversight and risk controls along with the necessary reporting infrastructure.

Using a service provider may also provide benefits for underlying investors to better align the performance of the investors' non-base currency share classes with the fund base currency class performance. There is also the potential for reduced transaction costs due to execution netting opportunities that a service provider may offer which an investment manager may not.

BNY Mellon supports currency hedging programs with its currency administration services and is a leading industry service provider. We integrate and administer the components of a passive currency hedging program (share-class or portfolio).

Through our approach, you retain all investment management discretion while FX execution, administration and certain FX operational functions are handled by the BNY Mellon Markets Group's foreign exchange desk.
