

THE EVOLUTION OF COLLATERAL SEGREGATION

Regulation – it's having a ripple effect throughout the financial markets and changing the way you do business. One change having a significant impact on the financial markets is the growing need for collateral in financial transactions.

Collateral is one element of covering counterparty risk in a financial transaction. If a counterparty goes into default, an institution uses the collateral to help cover the loss.

Not too long ago, there were only a handful of transaction types that required institutional investors to post collateral, and the processes for posting collateral were not highly regulated or uniform throughout the world's financial markets. Institutional investors didn't always have a full understanding of who their counterparties were or where their collateral was being held.

Then the financial crisis hit in 2008.

Large institutions defaulted and some went bankrupt, and some assets that were linked to financial transactions could not be recovered. Certain counterparties who had posted collateral struggled to obtain the collateral due to them.

After the crisis, regulators and policy makers stepped in to create new rules and reforms in an effort to reduce risk in the financial markets.

Global reforms mandated the use of collateral in financial transactions that hadn't required collateral before and introduced new players such as central clearing counterparties (CCPs) for derivatives transactions. Reforms sought to ensure that sufficient collateral was posted, that it was protected in the event of counterparty insolvency and delivered to the correct counterparty upon termination.

International regulatory bodies have created regulations and guidelines that cover collateral segregation rules for uncleared bi-lateral OTC derivatives and CCP centrally cleared derivatives transactions.

As institutions large and small look for answers to these questions and guidance in this new environment, they need support for their individual business requirements. One size does not fit all.

BNY MELLON
